My Tryst with Jason on an Online Dating Site

Hi, my name is Stephanie. I work as a marketing head of a reputed pharmaceutical company in Brantford. For a girl like me (who is considerably good looking and who is in her twenties) life was great with a successful career, good job, achieving target within the deadline, good perks, easy life everything was good until I realised I was missing something in my life. It's been a while since I am single. I was into a relationship during my college days, but eventually we realised our interests differ and we broke up, though we are still friends and are in touch even today. Life after the college was occupied with job and meeting the deadlines. But two years after joining as a trainee on my first job, today, I have reached a commendable position, and now as things are going smoothly on professional front, I feel the loneliness in my personal life. Katie, a colleague of mine suggested me to try for free online dating which is a craze now-a-days. At first I thought I wasn't very impressed with it, but nevertheless I decided to give it a shot.   With Katie's help I set up my profile and photos on one online dating site. I hid   certain facts about mine initially purposefully. For instance, I didn't tell about my financial stability because I didn't want anyone to show interest in me just because I earn pretty well. Anyways, within next few days, I got several requests, but none of them were matching up to what I was looking for. On the fifth day after I posted my profile, I received a request from a Guy named Jason, who is an entrepreneur by profession. His message caught my attention because he mentioned about his experience of trekking in British Columbia's Wild West Mackenzie Trail. Since I love trekking and a member of a local armature trekking club, I replied to him. After few days of chatting with the instant messenger of the dating site, we realised that we share similar interests and hobbies, and that made me feel Jason was just the kind of guy I was looking for. It's been three months and we are doing fine. In fact, after my recent tour to British Columbia, we have decided to go for our first date.   My perception towards Online Dating is completely changed now. All thanks to Online Dating, my life is not mundane or monotonous anymore. I have someone special to talk to, listen to, and turn on to whenever I feel lonely and stressed. Well, now I guess Online Dating definitely works. Try it, and I'm sure, you won't regret your decision.
